

A NOVEL BY J.R. McGEE

What if losing your mind was the first sign you were finally seeing reality clearly?

Cal has spent years medicating the parts of himself that never quite fit reality. When he stops, reality starts answering back.

What begins as an apparent psychological breakdown pulls him into a hidden world of fractured souls, impossible abilities, angels, pharmaceutical conspiracies—and the terrifying possibility that he isn't losing his mind at all.

SELECT EXCERPTS

CHAPTER 1

"My reflection doesn't wince. It just stands there while I paw at my head, and something in me goes very still. Is it looking at me? ...No. It's smiling."

CHAPTER 3

"I turned around. My pulse traveled through me and golden light erupted from my hand."

CHAPTER 14

"The place is fragmented and cracked, a whole world built out of the same crystalline shards the mirror was... and I realized I had fallen into Wayne's memory."

CHAPTER 17

"I can't make a single person love me. I have tried since I was a child, and it nearly killed me. I can't control what others think of me. I can only control myself. And you cannot control me."
